Well this ought to be interesting.

If you have an iPad or an iPhone, head over to FilmOn.com in the web browser. What you're looking at are all the broadcast TV stations in the LA area, plus a couple at the bottom of the list that definitely aren't safe for work.

Tap any of the network stations and—voila—there's some live TV for you. Nice, huh? It's fast, too, and the picture's not half bad.

So how long can this underground, fly-by-night pirate site go before it's taken offline? If the company's founder, billionaire Alki David, has his way: never. He'd probably take issue with the thought of it being a fly-by-night operating since FilmOn has been around in Europe for a few years and "is listed on the Frankfurt Stock Exchange with a market cap of $567 million," according to Reuters.

CNET Parent Sued by Rappers for Distributing LimeWire

by Robert Quigley () | Thursday, May 5th 2011 at 11:00 am

The site formerly known as Download.com is now a part of tech site CNET; CNET is owned by CBS Interactive; the site now known as download.cnet.com distributes now-defunct P2P client LimeWire, which received a court order last year to cease offering any file-sharing or search features. Being an ad-supported site, CNET profited by distributing over 220 million copies of LimeWire since 2008 — an estimated 95 percent of all LimeWire downloads — and since courts ruled last year that LimeWire was liable for inducing copyright infringement and failing to take “meaningful steps to mitigate infringement,” by the commutative property, CBS Interactive may have profited by encouraging copyright infringement.

Such, anyway, is the reasoning of a group of rappers and other plaintiffs who have sued CBS Interactive for “massive copyright infringement” this week.
